This book is based on a series of public lectures delivered at the University of Warwick between January and March 1988, and is a collaborative endeavour. My thanks go to all those who helped make it possible: first and foremost my colleagues in the Department of International Studies at Warwick who strongly supported the idea that the Department should sponsor a series of lectures on Thatcherism, and the Departmental Secretary, Mrs Joy Gardner, who handled the correspondence and administration of the project with her usual tact and sympathy. The Departments of Economics and Politics provided co-sponsorship and, together with the University, the additional finance without which it would have been impossible to proceed. I would like to thank them, and also the Birmingham Post which, in the person of Tom Quirke, upheld its fine record of serious journalism by following the series with close attention and printing large extracts from the lectures on its leader page. I must thank the contributors for coming; their audiences of faculty and students for responding to them so appreciatively and questioning them so pertinently; the University's Audio-Visual Centre for recording the lectures; and Mrs Dorothy Foster of the Politics Department for transcribing them. Finally, I am grateful to my publishers for getting the presses rolling so promptly. Nothing dates so soon as assessments of yesterday's political events; the Thatcherism here analysed is today's, and tomorrow's, news.
